Field Day Sparkle

Today was Tippington Schools' Field Day. The three local schools had come together to compete in all sorts of different games and sports. Kirsty was staying with her best friend, Rachel Walker, in Tippington during school break, so she had come along to watch.

The 100-yard dash was the last race of the morning, and Rachel was doing really well. She was neck and neck with one other girl as they sprinted toward the finish line.

"Come on, Rachel, keep going!" Kirsty yelled. The two runners were so close, it was impossible to guess who was going to win. Then, at the very last moment, Rachel surged past the other girl with a final burst of speed, and crossed the finish line.

"Yay! Rachel wins!" Kirsty cheered, jumping up and down. She beamed at some of the other children who had watched the race, but they all looked unhappy. They must have wanted the other girl to win really badly, Kirsty thought. Rachel came over a few minutes later, smiling. Her face was flushed. "Phew – that was a close one," she panted.

"You were amazing!" Kirsty smiled. "What an exciting race!" "Well, I thought so," Rachel said. "But have you noticed that everyone else seems really bored?"

Kirsty looked around. It was true. A girl nearby was scuffing the grass with her foot complaining to her dad that she was too cold. One of the older boys was saying that he was hungry. Even some of the teachers seemed bored.

A startling thought struck both girls at the same time. "It must be because the Tuesday Fun Flag is missing," Kirsty said in a low voice.
