Arts and Crafts

‘This is great, Kirsty!’ Rachel Walker said, beaming at her best friend, Kirsty Tate, as they wandered around the Tippington Community Centre Arts and Crafts Fair. ‘I don’t know what to try first!’

The fair was in dull swing. Wooden tables covered with long white cloths had been placed in a huge square, and each table had been set up for different crafts. Rachel and Kirsty could see neat piles of velvet, satin and silk fabrics for patchwork on one table, and knitting needles and baskets of fluffy wool on another. At one corner of the square, a man was demonstrating origami, and Mrs Walker, Rachel’s mum, was running the scrapbooking stall. Each table had space for people to try the crafts themselves, and there were already long queues at some of them.

‘It’s fantastic isn’t it?’ Kirsty agreed, looking around. ‘And I’ve just thought of something: with so much colourful fabric and paper about, this would be the perfect place to find one of the fairies’ Fun Day Flags!’

‘You’re right!’ Rachel agreed. ‘And it’s Wednesday today, so we should look out for Willow’s Wednesday flag.’

Kirsty and Rachel shared a wonderful secret. They were friends with the fairies, and had often helped their tiny friends when icy Jack Frost and his mean goblin servants caused trouble. Now the fairies had asked the girls to help them find the seven magical flags which the Fun Day Fairies used to recharge their magic, so that every day of the week could be filled with fun.
