A Mysterious Message

"Oh!" Rachel Walker panted as she trudged up the steep hill. "I'm really out of breath, Kirsty."

"Me, too," Kirsty Tate, Rachel's best friend, agreed. "Even Buttons looks a bit tired, and you know how he usually bounces around."

Buttons, the Walkers' shaggy dog, was trotting along his lead beside Rachel, his pink tongue hanging out. "It'll be worth it when we get to the top, girls," called Rachel's dad. He was walking behind them with Mrs Walker and Kirsty's parents, carrying the picnic basket. "The view will be fantastic." A few moments later, Rachel and Kirsty reached the top of the hill. Both girls gasped with delight as they gazed around. "You were right, Dad," Rachel smiled. "It was worth it," Kirsty added. The sun was shining and the countryside that was spread out below them looked beautiful. Lush green fields stretched below them looked beautiful. Lush green fields stretched away in every direction and, nestled in a little valley, the girls could see the thatched cottages of Blossom Village. "Blossom Village almost looks Fairyland-size from here!" Rachel whispered to Kirsty. Kirsty laughed. She and Rachel knew more about Fairies than anyone else in the world! The fairies were their special friends, and the girls had visited fairyland many times. "Look, there's Blossom Hall," remarked Mr Tate, pointing at a bigger building beyond the village. The Tates and the Walkers were spending their Easter holidays in the old Tudor house that was now a country hotel. "Even that looks small from up here!"

Kirsty and Rachel shared a smile as they gazed at Blossom Hall. Their stay at the old hotel had led to a whole new fairy adventure. On their first day at the hall, they had met Tia the tulip fairy in the beautiful gardens.
