Magic Message

‘There,’ Rachel Walker said, tidying her hair. ‘I’m ready. Are you?’ Kirsty Tate buttoned her jodhpurs and smiled at her best friend. ‘Yes.’ she said. ‘I can’t wait!’

It was the first day of the Easter holidays, and Kirsty had come to stay with Rachel’s family for a week.

In a few minutes, they would be setting off for a riding lesson at the Tippington Stables, and both girls were looking forward to it. They always seemed to have the best fun when they were together-and the most exciting adventures.

Kirsty was just about to open the door, when something caught her eye. The pages of Rachel’s diary were fluttering as it lay on her bed, and yet there was no breeze in the room. ‘Rachel!’ she said, pointing. ‘Look!’

She and Rachel ran over excitedly. They had each been given matching bejewelled diaries by the King and Queen of Fairyland, as thank-you presents for helping the fairies. The two girls had been friends with the fairies long enough now to know that the fluttering pages of a book meant only one thing: something magical was about to happen!

Kirsty held a breath as the diary fell open at two blank pages, and then she gasped as sparkly gold writing appeared on the paper, letter by letter.

‘It’s a message,’ Rachel whispered, her heart pounding. ‘We...need...your...help!’ The golden letter spelled.

‘The fairies must be in trouble!’ Kirsty cried.
